Q

From the Pro....

Questions and Answers

QUESTION: Can someone offer advice on hitting back a ball with heavy, heavy top spin. Specifically:

- 1. Hitting a volley back from a ball with heavy topspin.
- 2. Hitting an overhead off a short, heavy topspin lob.
- 3. Hitting a groundstroke back from a heavy topspin groundstroke.

My returns tend to flub off my racquet. Am I not following through enough? Or stroking firmly enough? Or what? Help!

ANSWER: There are two major adjustments a player must make in order to handle a heavy topspin shot. The first (the most obvious) is read the spin on the ball. The second is (the most overlooked) repositioning for the flight pattern. Heavy topspin shots will tend to climb and drop very quickly. The traditional hitting with a square face won't be as successful in this situation. Here are my suggestions for handling heavy topspin:

- Volleying With a rapid dipping ball approaching, close the net and open the racquet for slicing. Slicing will not only assist your volley over the net but also give your heavy top-spinner a tough low ball.
- Overheads On short, heavy topspin lobs, always plan to attack the ball on the rise. Heavy topspin lobs can get behind you faster then you think. Try hitting an overhead prior to the bounce; meet the ball with the face slightly open.
- Groundstrokes Racquet prep is key. A shortstop in baseball always has the glove down since he expects a lot of ground balls. The same approach should be used in groundstrokes and serve returns. But hold your racquet high to better address the high balls. Your shot will be similar to a high volley but with a bounce.

Playing a heavy top-spinner can be very frustrating for a lot of players.

Just remember the best way to perform a job correctly is use the right tool. Think about that the next time you try to hammer a screw in.
